Her person is slender and extremely youthful, full of gentle grace, and yet not without animation and fire in her movements. The phrase "getting the prices right" has in fact been most strongly applied to agriculture. Timmer, The core of the argument is that in following policies designed to promote the development of heavy industry, primarily state-owned and always state-regulated, government policies had a "bias against agriculture," in a title of a book edited by Bautistia and Valdes. In the language of World Bank economists, agriculture was "directly taxed" through policies that held down prices for agricultural products from actual levies and purchases by marketing boards and other parastatals to such things as zoning restrictions and export bans and "indirectly taxed" through the macro-economic and trade policies that kept import prices and thus prices of agricultural inputs high and export prices and thus crop prices, for these were exportables in most third world countries low.
